portation used in reaching work as well as time consumed in transit. This information will throw light on the extent of need for new low rent housing and will aid in determining the type, needed accommodations and the most suitable locations of such required housing.

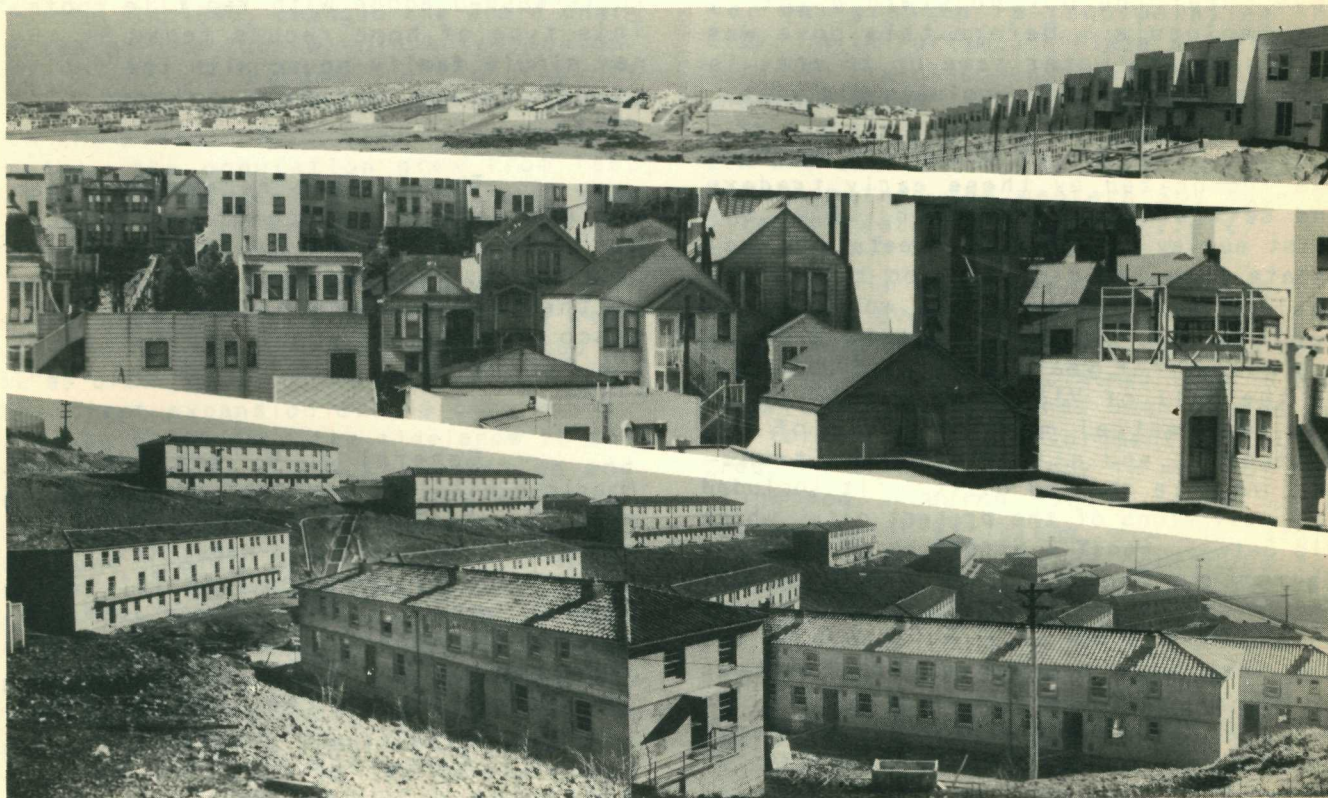

Besides these two major sections there is a section on residential hotels, a type of housing peculiar to San Francisco. 499 of the 747 hotel structures in this city have ceased catering to transients and rent predominantly to a residential population.² It was impossible to clearly segregate the latter from the former for the purposes of this survey, as many hotel owners are reluctant to admit the changed status of their hotels.

The 34,288 inventory schedules representing, primarily, one room dwelling units in these structures are an incomplete coverage of this type of permanent residence; this large number, however, does emphasize its importance in the pattern of San Francisco housing.

² Many rooming houses, 'flop' houses, etc., have licenses which classify them officially as hotels, but were not so classified by this survey. See Definitions.
